

Key Pieces of Management We Learned:

- How to create an effective business concept with other people.
- How to listen to other people's opinions and incorporate them into your own.
- How to explain to other people concepts they do not understand or simply get my point across.
- How to do the "Right Work, Done Well!"
- What the different management styles are and their history.
- How to create the foundation for how a business will be run (vision, mission, and core value statements).
- How to create Corporate Social Responsibility initiatives that align with your business and implement them.
- How to expand a business from one area to the national and global market.
 - What tactics to use when changing your product for each country based on their culture, values, and beliefs.
- How to address employees after an employee has left the company, and how to change your management philosophy based on that.
- How to create and implement employee motivation initiatives to keep employees motivated.
- How to identify the key drivers of employee engagement to keep employee culture and motivation high.
- How to tell the difference between a leader and a manager, such as different characteristics, responsibilities, and some layovers.
- How to make better decisions, whether that includes taking more time to make them or consulting others.
- How to communicate more effectively as a manager with employees.
- How to identify the importance of performance management, human resources functions, and organization design.
- How to create a well-dressed measure, SIPOC, and other visuals to get a better understanding of how the organization is performing.
- How to know when to sell the business or hold on to it.

Feedback Questions:

- 1) The most interesting topics for me in the team exercises were the mission, value, and vision statements, as well as learning about corporate social responsibility (CSR). While these may seem mundane and useless, they provide the very foundation on which the business rests. If the business lacks clear direction from these statements, both customers and employees will be confused about the company's true purpose. Perfecting these in class definitely has one of the most long-lasting and impactful effects on learning to manage people.
- 2) All my interactions with my group members were enlightening and revealed many different perspectives. While we had some disagreements about the best course of action for some exercises, we were always able to reach a compromise that made everyone happy. To resolve these disagreements, the CEO would usually take charge, ensuring that everyone's voice was heard and incorporating every thought into our response, rather than taking one from someone's individual case to answer the question. Everyone always participated, and it was fun getting to know new people and their ways of thinking through this project.
- 3) I am confident in my group's presentation because we all put in the time and effort not just for ourselves, but for the other group members. We all approached the project as if we were earning each other's grades rather than our own, motivating each other to do our best work possible. I believe it encouraged me not to procrastinate because I wanted everyone in my group to know I cared about their grade as much as I did about mine. The only thing I would change about our approach is that I would have taken more time to work on it together. It felt like we did our parts for each other, but never truly went over them as a group. Overall, I am still proud of the work we did.

- 4) Based on my interactions with my groupmates, I would be more of an administrative manager. I know myself, the people I have worked with, and how easy it is to procrastinate or get distracted when trying to complete my work. It is just easier to stay organized and make sure everyone is keeping on top of their work. However, I also learned from this course that you have to make people feel appreciated to get them to complete said work. For example, you could use more open communication between levels, provide more regular feedback, allow for breaks during work, and more. I have also learned that managing my time efficiently is vital to making the most of my time here, whether at Rutgers or at a future company.
- 5) To make the team exercises and project more interesting, we could have added more visuals, such as pictures, to balance the amount of text on the slides or to summarize bullet points to get the point across faster. Overall, though, we did a good job with the quality of our output.
- 6) To make the textbook for the course a better learning tool, I think it would be better to name the chapters next to the "Chapter ..." label. It is hard going back and forth between modules to find exactly what I need, whether I am studying or preparing for our final presentation. For the video lectures, I would say the same name-wise, but overall, Professor Hamilton seems so sweet and invested in the work he is teaching, and I loved it.
